Build your own Altoids Tin Headphone Amplifier

A Collaboration Between IEEE and AEE

On Tuesday, October 19th at 7:00 pm in rm 3400 EB, AEE will be hosting an opportunity for any student to learn about these pocket sized headphone amplifiers. A 30 minute lecture will be given explaining the technical reasons why a headphone amplifier makes your music sound so much better. The following week there will be a lab section where IEEE will help you build your own for the cost of an Altoids tin! Even if you know nothing about electrical circuits you can do this project.

There will be two different amplifier designs to choose from. The first is a simple and well documented design that anyone can build, and will provide increased listening enjoyment when used with headphones. The second is slightly more complex, and can also be used to drive a small pair of speakers using only battery power. This design is more suited towards a person that has some level of experience building electronic circuits.

One completed amplifier of each design will be passed around during the lecture, so bring your headphones and mp3 player to experience the difference for yourself.

All of the required materials will be provided free of charge except for an Altoids tin, which you must bring to the first lab section. Space is limited to the first 16 people that respond, so if you are interested please contact zajacste@msu.edu
